October 29, 2010

10:00 am to 4:00 pm
Middlebury College, Middlebury, VT

Given the global challenges of the 21st century, colleges and universities must become more intentional about the kinds of learning students need, as well as the effective educational practices that help students integrate and apply their learning.

This day-long workshop invites participation from campus teams aiming to align global learning goals with essential learning outcomes.

Attendees will:

- explore the meaning and components of “global learning;”
- investigate the range of high impact pedagogies and curricular and co-curricular practices that enhance global learning;
- build a “smart-grid” among the diversity, civic, student success, and global citizenship movements; and
- identify strategies for integrating a global learning agenda into current institutional goals and initiatives.

Responding to feedback from attendees at the last three “Fostering Global Citizenship in Higher Education” conferences held in Vermont, we are taking a hiatus from the conference format to provide an opportunity to delve more deeply into the topic of global learning through this day-long workshop.

Registration will open in August 2010.
